The State of Washington

For higher degree of social development, a new era is required as a condition of the transition. At a workmen's meeting in the State of Washington, the speaker said, 'We are on the threshold of a new era.' The meeting had been called for the purpose of discussing the subject of education.

Washington's public schools have been in operation for about thirty years. The system of education in the state is based upon the principles of the late President, who believed that education should be free and compulsory. The state has made great progress in the field of education within the last ten years, but many important reforms are still needed.

The introduction of the people of Washington to the advantages of the new era will depend upon the development of social and intellectual progress. There is a need for increased activity in the field of education, and the state should be prepared to meet the needs of the people when they enter into the new era.

In conclusion, the speaker emphasized the importance of education in the social and economic development of the state. He said that education is the key to the progress of Washington, and that the people should strive to make the state a model of education for the rest of the country.
